Have Written Agreements. The time when a man's word was as good as his bond seems to have belonged some remote period. The present generation look upon it with as much incredulity as upon the fables found in classic mythology. Yet, occasionally, we hear of persons who place so much confidence in friends that they do not require a written agreement, and afterwards they bitterly repent of their indiscretion. Experience is said to be the best teacher. It may be so, but it is often an expensive one. Wise is he who, in the beginning, familiarizes himelf with the history of others, and from it learns wisdom. In visiting an unknown land common sense teaches one to use a guide book and not foolishly try to find out everything for himself. Still there are individuals who possess such confidence that it is extremely difficult for them to exercise their faculties of precaution.—Albany Times.
